Operations can be reduced to two processes: the creation of a product and the creation of a customer. It is a challenge to align these two, so that overstock or long delivery times can be prevented. While most are aware that the principles of scientific management by Frederick Taylor have been adopted by production (l), we need to be mindful that similar principles have also been applied to customer creation (r), causing frontline employees to disengage from their customers.